Investment highlights

April was defined by a strong recovery as markets shrugged off geopolitical tensions. US markets led performance, driven largely by reinvigorated enthusiasm around artificial intelligence. Semiconductor stocks were the standout, with the Philadelphia Semiconductor Index surging close to 40% as investors continued to price in long-term structural growth in AI infrastructure. Europe and the UK recovered a bit slower, reflecting higher sensitivity to energy prices and weaker investor sentiment, while Asian markets posted steady gains.

Oil remained the key macro driver throughout the month. Price swings reflected shifting geopolitical expectations, but the broader impact was seen in inflation data, with US headline inflation rising to 3.3% due to energy costs, while core inflation stayed more contained. Central banks held rates steady across the US, UK and Europe, but messaging turned more cautious. Policymakers remain alert to the inflationary impact of energy markets, and the path for rate cuts is now less certain. Overall, there was relief felt in markets in April, but they remain highly sensitive to geopolitics, energy prices and policy signals.
